Develop innovative and expanded opportunities for professional development that are relevant across the global contexts of academic advising.	Participants will make or strengthen connections with NACADA members with shared interests and values. Participants will learn information and strategies they can apply to their own advising work.	Collaborate with other advising communities to offer virtual learning events for our community members.	Post-event surveys.	While we are open to a variety of partners, we hope to work with the Transfer Advising Community, and the Wellbeing and Advisor Retention Community, in particular.	Scheduling and marketing events continues to be a challenge, so we will try to plan as far in advance as we can. In addition, we have heard from members that they are still feeling overwhelmed by increased workload and pandemic-related demands on their time and energy, which make negatively impact participation rates. We will try to respond to this issue by focusing on practical topics that participants can apply to current issues.

Develop innovative and expanded opportunities for professional development that are relevant across the global contexts of academic advising.	Participants will learn information and strategies they can apply to their own advising work.	Leverage the Community Listserv to promote informal discussion, resource sharing, and broader connections across the membership.	Track participation in Listserv discussions. If we are able to return to the practice of posting “listserv” digests on the Community website, we would also want to track how often these are accessed.	We are open to “guest” facilitators from any Advising Community interested in engaging with the Faculty Advising Community.	Ensuring enough facilitators to engage members through the Listserv on a recurring basis has been a challenge in the past. Steering Committee members will serve in this role first to establish good practices we can then present to other potential facilitators.
